Amazon Bans Giving Away Free Products In Exchange For Reviews Recently, Amazon announced that it was updating its policies to prohibit third-party incentivized reviews.

Amazon's policy update, under prohibited seller activities and actions, now says, in part: "you may not provide compensation (including free or disc) reviews or that offer compensation are prohibited. You may not ask buyers to modify or remove reviews."

The disclaimers indicated to me that a seller was probably trying to buy their way to a good rank and didn't have confidence in the product, and also probably hadn't made the effort to create a good listing.

Buyers will now have more confidence in their purchasing decisions, knowing that reviews come from people who actually bought the product and who weren't being "bribed" or in cahoots with the seller.

Most of the sellers affected by this rule change are those who do private label, which is a more advanced technique. But it also can apply to sellers who create bundles. Same idea: the updated policy levels the playing field and means those of you who work to create something of value won't be undermined by those who take the "easy way".

And most of all, you need to provide something of value to buyers. That would mean a great product that solves a problem for them or meets some demand, or a well thought-out bundle that groups together related products and makes life easier
