While generally you cannot be successfully sued for giving a negative review on social media based on your opinion, if you state as facts that which is untrue and harms their commercial reputation, that would be a basis for a claim of commercial slander. If you were a competitor, it may also give rise to a claim for unfair business practices. Accusing a business of being a fake company, could cause others to not want to do business with it. Of course truth is a defense, depending upon what you mean by fake company and how you would go about proving that was true.

If all you have gotten is a letter threatening legal action, you can reply stating that you regret your harsh review and have deleted it. That will probably resolve the situation.

Well, I am not a lawyer, but here we go:

The short answer is "yes"; basically, in the U.S. anyone can sue anyone else for just about anything.
