The program lets anyone sign up to shuttle packages for the world's largest online store using their own cars and get paid by the delivery. But first, they need to score some actual work. Amazon depends on a patchwork of government postal workers, international shipment operators like UPS and FedEx, local carriers and its own armada of warehouses, planes and trucks to deliver packages as quickly as possible to customers. Amazon Flex is one of the newest and largely unseen additions to this network, but it already has people in more than 50 U.S. cities handling packages in their spare time.

"The delivery windows are really, really tight, so you have to hustle," Karunungan says. "You're not an Amazon driver if you haven't run a stop sign." Many drivers say they suspect the odds of getting a shift are higher if they wait in the warehouse. Amazon can track their location using the phone's GPS and should reward people ready to work, they reason. At Amazon's San Francisco location, a wall close to where drivers hang out features a large mural of a tree with the phrase, "Work Hard. Have Fun. Make History. Amazon." They're not paid for time spent waiting for an assignment. Amazon says Flex workers in some cities can avoid trips to the warehouse by picking food or grocery orders.

The acquisition of Whole Foods last year for $13.7 billion gave Amazon more than 470 additional stores from which it can stow, package and deliver goods to online shoppers. It has already begun to leverage parts of that logistics opportunity this year.

Amazon pays Flex workers twice a week via direct deposit to their bank accounts.

Jodi Lynn Reeves signed up for Amazon Flex in Kansas City, Missouri, after she left her job at a company that collects coins from laundromats and struggled to find steady employment. She says she'd get a buzz when the money from Amazon would appear in her checking account every few days.

"Through Amazon, I felt so blessed," she says. "More than the money, I loved seeing the sunsets while I was driving. I lost weight lifting all the heavy packages and getting my steps in looking for the doors."
