Part time college professor on the side in addition to full time sysadmin. Can t each IT courses a few hours for a few nights per week. The part time teaching pa y works out to about the same hourly rate as my sysadmin job - adds up to roughl y 10k per year.

In my area, anyone with 5 years of IT experience is qualified to teach college I T courses. No further credentials required.

It's a good way to help out your household if needed. But honestly, I think the better answer is to find a new full time job that pays an increased rate. Ea sier said than done, but I think working full time is enough for one person.

I've always been a mechanical hands on person, so I work on jet skis for peo ple around my area. The best part is since they're considered a luxury item the prices that dealers charge are insane, so I can undercut them and still make a decent penny. A simple 1 hour job could run you $1500-$2000 at the dealer, so I charge $500 or so. I'm happy, the people are happy and I'm having fun while doing it.

Got into it a few years ago when I bought my first jet ski, instantly fell in lo ve with it and had to pretty much disassemble it to learn everything about it. Q uickly learned how to maintain and repair them and it took off from there. Now i t's just a word of mouth thing where I'll get a random text at work aski ng if I can do X repair. Granted it's not constant income, I go weeks withou t working on a ski, but I'm not in it to make a job out of it. It's more of a "I enjoy this, I might as well make some extra cash in my free time&q uot: type thing.
